SOUL HABITATS
Uncovering the desire to create spaces that are authentic expressions of ourselves, tell our story and provide a refuge from the outside world.

Creating our habitats is such a subjective process that describing the contemporary trends is a challenge to do with any sort of structure or methodology. That said, given the range of categories we survey to find stories each day for COOL HUNTING – a publication that since 2003 has informed and inspired the creative community that's designing the future – we do see emergent patterns and persistent underlying themes.

For decades we've witnessed the pendulum swing between minimalism and maximalism, persistent material innovation and the importance of narrative in the way we create our spaces.

Aesthetic choices today aren't dominated by any particular trends so much as the desire for change, personal expression and soul soothing.

While maximalism is clearly popular these days, so is minimalism. It's no longer a question of which is trending. Perhaps as a result of spending much more time at home during the pandemic some people began to accumulate more and others took the time to pare down their belongings. In both cases it seems to have been a time of deep reflection and the birth of a new self expression driven more from personal desire than trend alignment.

The common thread seems to be authenticity of experience. People want their homes to tell a story and to provide an escape from the outside world.

Whether that's achieved with a spartan aesthetic or a more maximalist one, the goal is to create a space that feels like an extension of oneself, a place of refuge where one can feel safe and comfortable.

Sustainability is a word that gets thrown around a lot and it can mean different things to different people. For some it's about reducing their carbon footprint, for others it's about supporting companies that are environmentally conscious, and for others it's about using materials that will have a minimal impact on the planet long after they've served their purpose in our homes. The answer we all can agree on is that having fewer, better things is a path to reduced consumption and impact.

But how do we define "better?"
For starters, we want things that are made so well they'll last long enough to pass on to younger generations. And we want designs that are reflective of who we are so that we're not only passing down objects, but also memories.

A passion for design classics and icons has fueled a growing interest in collecting vintage pieces. In turn, this increase in appreciation of a more diverse set of historic designs has opened the door to reissued and reimagined classics. Combined with modern manufacturing, these vintage, soulful looking pieces are constructed more robustly than ever and will last perhaps longer than the memories they hold.

"Better" is also influenced by the materials used – sustainably sourced robust natural materials promise to last. Stone, glass and rattan have been used for generations yet the products we see being made today using these materials are being constructed with a new level of engineering that only contemporary design and manufacturing tools can afford. In turn, a rattan chair made today, for example, is surely going last much longer than our beloved ones of the late 70s.

In the world of lighting – one of the most important elements of soulful living – the revolution LEDs has enabled is remarkable.

Once a technology reserved for business and gimmicky environments, today we see designers imaging forms that occupy space and spread light in ways unimaginable only a few years ago. And the added benefit of their lower power consumption and longer bulb longevity makes everyone happy regardless of their stylistic point of view.

Perhaps driven by the desire to reduce, reuse and recycle, material innovation has exploded and evolved to a point where we're seeing gorgeous, sophisticated and expressive materials made from unimaginable source material – like leather made from mushrooms or pineapples, plastics derived from potatoes or tomatoes and particle board made from coffee hulls. All with the warmth and emotion we crave plus the added bonus of a new storyline to tell our friends and guests when showing them around our homes.

Soulful living can be as much about how we feel about our spaces as it is about how we share them with our guests.

The pieces we choose to bring into our homes hold stories ready to be told. Vintage indigo textiles found on our many trips to Japan, that chair from an up-and-coming designer who we spotted early in their career, the re-issued mid-century lamp that's just like the one we grew up with in our childhood home. There's a growing appreciation for furniture and décor that has a story to tell, that connects us to the people and places that we love.

As we continue to spend more time at home it seems we're increasingly interested in creating spaces that nurture our soul. We want our habitats to be an authentic expression of ourselves, to tell our story and to provide a refuge from the outside world. As designers it's our responsibility to create soulful furnishings, lighting, accessories and spaces that inspire and embrace the people who inhabit them and, in turn, create opportunities for deeper connection to and storytelling about our material posessions.

EVREN RECOMMENDS the CHARM of the PISS GUTTER

LARSBJØRNSSTRÆDE. Part of the LATIN QUARTER, "The Piss Gutter", as the locals like to call it, was home to writers, artists and bohemians in the 60s and 70s, and before that to the avantgarde, the anti-authoritative and at times the downright illegal. Today a trendy neighbourhood, the foul odours may be gone, but LARSBJØRNSSTRÆDE remains a special place with heart and soul.

A CASE OF MINIMALIST OPULENCE

SHIMON OVADIA sees the world through a design lens.

He was born in JERUSALEM and moved to BROOKLYN, NYC, with his family at the age of four. Growing up, Shimon often helped his father who owned a children's apparel company, and his childhood, no doubt, shaped his outlook and choice of career.

Today Shimon runs Ovadia Bros., an interior and fashion design studio in SOHO, with his twin brother Ariel.

As a fashion and interior designer SHIMON gravitates towards an aesthetic of understated luxury. He describes the style of his HOME — a sophisticated, self-renovated 1930s townhouse — as minimalist opulence.

"I'm always changing and evolving my space. But I consistently lean towards a sense of calm. In a busy life with a crazy schedule, it's important for me to feel I'm in a relaxed element at home."

HOME SHOULD BE A SAFE HAVEN

"I try to keep things uncluttered. But I also like trinkets and little things. So there's a sort of balance I try to meet."

SHIMON OVADIA RECOMMENDS a REBALANCING RITUAL

"Almost every day at home in the evening or in the office when I come in, I burn a Japanese incense. There's a company called ELEMENSE.

They have very high quality, beautiful incense."

"Then I brew up a pot of tea. I lean towards an old French brand called Mariage Frères. They make some of the best teas in the world. In the wintertime, there's a bourbon tea that I really enjoy. And there's a bergamot and mint tea that I love. But really, all of their teas are incredible. And the packaging is beautiful, too."

"Perhaps I light a fire and listen to "Home – Autumn 22" by Shimon Ovadia" on Spotify. I really savor these quiet moments."

CONG LIAISON ING

ALFRED BRAMSEN has been in love with JAPAN since he was a child. Alongside a strong affinity for colour, BRAMSEN's love of all things JAPANESE is evident everywhere — from the clothes he wears, to the tones in his work and the interior design of his private habitat. ALFRED lives with his partner ISAAC, and their JAPANESE DOG, Chin Yuko, in an apartment in east LONDON.

"Being in a space where someone has consciously chosen everything that surrounds you, installs a sense of purposefulness and happiness in me."

ALFRED BRAMSEN RECOMMENDS a UMESHU SPRITZ

A Japanophile at heart, ALFRED often treats his guests to a glass of sweet-and-sour UMESHU, mixed with sparkling water. Despite the name, JAPANESE plum wine is, in fact, not a wine at all—it's liquor infused with plums, rather than fruit fermented into alcohol.

RECIPE: 1/3 Umeshu (Japanese plum wine) 2/3 Sparkling water Serve with ice

"It's really simple and it's really nice. And you can kind of drink a lot of it without getting too drunk."

"My FLANEUR SOFA has a sophisticated attitude.
When you look at it, you feel like it's drawing you to sit on it and rest in a posh way."
