Age-graded changes are usually thought of as changes in the use of a vowel that occur at particular ages in successive generations. They are then regular and predictable changes that might be thought of as marking a developmental stage in the individual's life. Few changes of this kind have been reported. One of the most common is the name of the last letter of the alphabet. 'Z' is called 'zee' everywhere in the world, not only in English but also in French, German, and most other languages, except in the United States, where it is called 'zee'. Hence 'zee' is an American idiosyncrasy.
